

Arguments against Plato's Theory of Forms

There is no proof of the World of Forms. Plato was not concerned with physical evidence on the whole point is that they are immaterial. This is not very scientific, and would make scientists who seek evidence claim his theory is unscientific.

Stephen Lee (1960-present) argued that if we are to believe there is a perfect Form of everything, there must also be perfect Forms of unpleasant things. This world requires the existence of deeply unpleasant things, such as evil, disease and death. The Platonic heaven of the Forms does not sound so heavenly.

Aristotle criticised Plato's Form of the Good. He argued that 'Good' comes in some varieties that there cannot just be a shadow of it. For example, the goodness of a person is different from the goodness of a stone.

Plato's view that the Forms are more real than the visible world has been criticised. It can be argued that something is real or isn't, since we can experience the visible world, it must in some sense be real. It therefore makes no sense to say that the Forms are more real.

Plato's understanding of reality can also be questioned. Many people would consider that something which exists physically is more real than something which does not.
