

The Hicks-Marshall Laws of Derived Demand

The factors that influence own-wage elasticity can be summarized by the Hicks-Marshall laws of derived demand—four laws. These laws assert that, other things equal, the own-wage elasticity of demand for a category of labor is high under the following conditions:

- ▶ When the price elasticity of demand for the product being produced is high.
- ▶ When other factors of production can be easily substituted for the category of labor.
- ▶ When the supply of other factors of production is highly elastic (that is, usage of other factors of production can be increased without substantially increasing their prices).
- ▶ When the cost of employing the category of labor is a large share of the total costs of production
