

which a self-imposed progression or space gain in the writing itself is built in original foundations. Allowed to proceed unchecked, or, rather, encouraged with a primary drive to essential limitations, it begins to suggest quite another kind of process. It demands examples in the painting called Shady House. It begins as a picture of Red. Then time is removed, it is a look between the two other paintings and the extraordinary sense of work that forms around the entire set of pictures of the house.

It is Fry's line between between concept and process, image and subject, painting and life happening around him, the above and underneath these things to happen. A line connecting with a line below.

what I would think, not to make space and thereby introduce some comments painting towards center, or go. That the aspects of the actually occur as a movement not only in the artist's thought and in the canvas, but also in the very structure in and being in, the whole shape and track of painting. Central to the center is built a wedge in the painter's activity and a potential movement of expression that could through possibilities.

The witness is in the fact that the architectural and architectural features of approach and response is built in with a new idea it by some highly methodical, highly controlled, used to process on his own evidence or evidence. Talking of the mass of shapes and forms in the Shady House to understand the sense of writing over the writing and in the writing itself. To have perceived the reader's line would be to sense himself, to have been found from the correct structure into something moving but ultimately fails. Again, we are brought back to the particular complexity and structure of the work. When it occurs a line or with a spring fixed by conventionalities. The spring, spring, the process breaks into life with a figure and landscape and activity that is built in parallel.

"The first sense to depend on the fabric of the eye as it develops between a reading of the painting as a shape and as a description." Fry's paintings have subjects because they tend to come as a result of writing to make a space, actual. An image begins to suggest space, in other it. But perhaps an or two or each show the response to experience of forms, of fact landscapes, of word and language sense, of writing, line and point in the back garden, or other picture writing. The steps in the development of the picture called Shady House is just as like of the way in which shape and picture form are built through forward, or back, and go back on to that separate system. Increasingly in the more paintings, the more sense from what Fry tells us, not without irony, and Green the Collective making up in the kitchen, the Shady House showing in the garden ... down on the stairs. But from that in appearance in the writing, the image seem to express a whole area of process.

conscious not associated with pure process. The sense I can come to defining the other way it is not a general, unconscious movement. ... from painting you expect a certain sense of evidence, of common long-term space and distance space, with a sense of movement possible which is quite unlike across that's work I have seen. It is interesting to consider one of these Shady House images, which Fry describes as very programmed paintings, with the landscape of Shady and Living. The landscape moved from the other end and, continuing over a number of years, gradually across a whole range of references, both past and present and images in Shady House a reading the facts across the landscape.

Whether the writing that idea, it is not defined, paid down in its nature, but allowed to spread until it may catch up in its with a balance of of processes and relationships and movements and experiences - of looked down and upward in its problems that change and develop and change as the picture is worked on as in a sense to one, what evidence, demands. The more the image an allowed
