

One Teach, One Observe

GOAL	USE	EXAMPLE	KEY
Data Collection Alternative: Teachers gather data on each other's teaching behavior	Periodic, with a specific purpose in mind	Monitor implementation of a BIP, observe student participation and interactions.	Both teachers observe and teach at various times

(Co-Teaching: Using the Six Approaches to Enhance Student Outcomes by Marilyn Friend, University of North Carolina at Greensboro, OANFEP Title/Federal Programs Spring Conference March 31, 2011)

Behind the Scenes

You and your co-teacher have just implemented flexible groups for your Shakespeare Unit. The groupings don't work out that well, and you don't have time to stay after school and plan because you have to pick up your son from day care. You and your co-teacher touch base after class, and decide to collect some data based off student behavior and working relationships to create more purposeful student groupings.

Making it Work

Implementing one teach, one observe goes hand in hand with tracking data. All you need is a chart to track the behavioral data and a little bit of independent planning time to decide the specific group behaviors you'll be observing. You and your partner will need to decide who is going to teach, and who is going to observe.

On the Teaching Stage

While one teacher delivers the lesson, the other teacher is making rounds in the classroom, observing group behavior and recording data. It's important for teachers to alternate roles throughout the unit to ensure parity in the classroom. Paras can also assist in recording data as well. After you've collected the data, use it to inform new groupings in the class.
