

This is followed by depolarisation of the ventricle, which is shown by the QRS complex. The R wave increases in size from 10 to 25 mm in height as it progresses. The R wave is usually higher than the S wave. The S wave decreases in size as the ECG becomes ventricular again, corresponding to the location of the cardiac action potential. During the plateau phase, the action potential is steady in the heart, which means no deflection appears on the ECG. This phase is followed by repolarisation, which is represented by the T wave. We use ST for the physiology of the various components shown in the ECG.

The QT interval is measured from the onset of the QRS complex to the end of the T wave. The duration of the QT interval is linked to heart rate. The faster the heart beats, the shorter the QT interval. The QT interval should always be corrected for heart rate, resulting in the corrected QT interval or QTc. There is a correction towards a heart rate of 60 bpm. You can use Bazett's formula to calculate QTc. See Table 29 for the normal duration of ECG components.

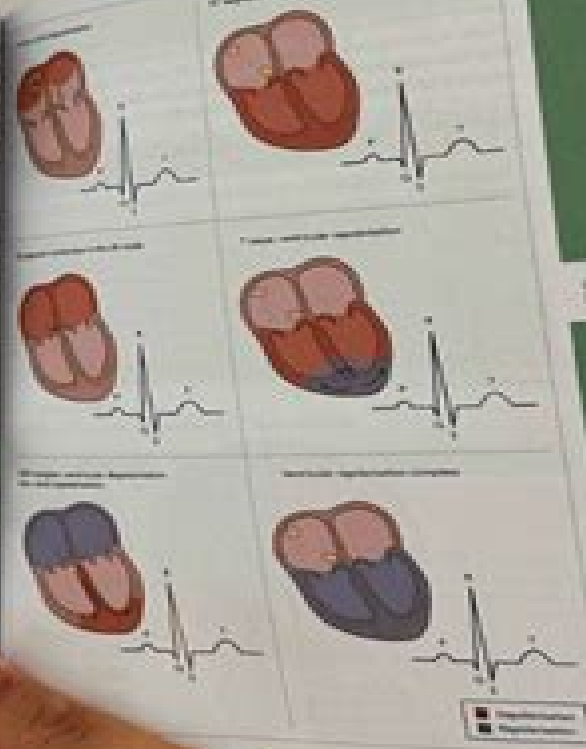

$$QTc = \frac{QT}{\sqrt{RR \text{ - interval (sec)}}}$$

Formula 1 QTc calculation with Bazett's formula

The QT interval is probably normal if QT < QTc of the RR interval

ECG EVENT	DURATION
PR interval	120-200 ms
QRS complex	80-120 ms
QTc segment	350-440 ms
