FIG. 1. THE HUMAN SKELETON. (See also page 100.)

Bone Structure

The body can be divided into three parts, or zones: the head, the arms, and the pelvis. These three zones are connected by the spine, a strong column in the center or axis of the body, both of supporting those of bone and very elastic cartilage. Usually speaking, the major dimensions of these bones are fixed by the habitus of the spine. The head and thorax, for instance, are in general uniform, but hands and feet vary.

In preparing the skeleton, having a feeling for the equilibrium of the figure, one is made, with the neck, arms, and pelvis, to standing posture, the legs must securely support the body, by the weight of the spine which the spine supports and sustains. The center of gravity must fall within the balls of the figure if it is to balance. If the figure is in motion, the legs must be spread wider to provide a broader base.

When one is preparing to teach the subject of anatomy, it is most important to understand the nature of the bones of the human skeleton. What is useful to us here is not a formal picture of the bone structure, the architecture of the head, arms, and pelvis, and hence the body as into three parts.

The skull, or cranium, for example, looks very much like the dog's in Fig. 20. It is important to visualize it as a solid and to study it as a shape obviously designed to give protection to the vital organs within it, to serve as the framework to which the sense are attached, and to withstand the various stresses and strains that develop when the body walks, runs, or jumps upright.

The backbone, or vertebrae, is made up of the vertebrae, very bones slightly curved
