

CHAPTER 2: ECONOMIC SYSTEMS

Different economic systems

Goal of the economic system = solve the economic problem by answering 3 questions(central)

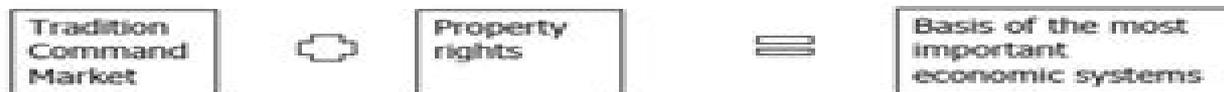

Each society must provide answers to three central questions:

- What goods and services are produced and in what quantities? OUTPUT QUESTIONS
- How will each of the goods and services be produced? INPUT QUESTIONS
- For whom will the various goods and services be produced? Where will the production occur? DISTRIBUTION QUESTIONS

In this chapter we look at some of the basic mechanisms that are used to solve these questions. There are essentially three coordinating mechanisms: traditional, command and the market. These three mechanisms form the basis of the most important economic systems (See box 2.1). We discuss 4 economic systems: the traditional system, the command system, the market system and mixed system. Our emphasis is on the market system and the mixed system, since most economies today are mixed systems in which the market plays a central role.

Classifying economic system:

Four systems of the economy

- A pattern or network of organisation which is aimed at solving the three main types of question of economics:
 - What goods and services will be produced and in what quantities (output questions)?
 - How will each of the goods and services be produced and how will scarce resources be allocated (input questions)?
 - For whom will the goods and services be produced and who will receive the goods and services (distribution questions)?
