

THE CONTROL ROOM

The control room of a printing press is the nerve center of the entire operation. It is here that the printer's assistant, the proofreader, and the compositor are seated, each with his own set of controls. The printer's assistant is responsible for the operation of the press, the proofreader for the accuracy of the copy, and the compositor for the arrangement of the type. The control room is a busy place, and the operators must be able to work quickly and accurately. The control room is also the place where the printer's assistant, the proofreader, and the compositor meet to discuss the progress of the work and to make any necessary adjustments. The control room is a vital part of the printing process, and it is essential that the operators be well-trained and experienced.
