

Gandhi & Eleanor Roosevelt: Pioneers of Human Rights Activism

Topic: Politics & Government | Words: 675 | Pages: 2

Mohandas Gandhi

Gandhi's struggle against human social injustices in the society in which he is known to have been a vocal activist started in South Africa in the late 18th century. At the time South Africa, like many other countries in Africa and elsewhere was sharply polarized along with racial backgrounds and many forms of discrimination that would later become apartheid were at its peak (Gandhi, 2007). It was in South Africa that Gandhi experienced firsthand discrimination because of his ethnicity that led to his deep involvement in fighting for his tribesmen's human rights by agitating for social reforms that were fair and just.

Throughout his life span of human rights activism, politics, and fight for freedom both in South Africa and India where he was later to return, Gandhi turned out to be an influential leader who adopted what would have been described as unconventional tactics at the time to achieve freedom and social justice among his people. By the time that he was assassinated in 1948, he had achieved much especially for India where he later shifted for most of his later and adult life (Gandhi, 2007).

To this day Gandhi is revered in India and elsewhere for having driven and accomplished several political and social changes that had been considered to be among his greatest while he was alive. Key among them include agitating for social justice in South Africa among Indians and thereby helped bring this injustice to the limelight; in India, he achieved more than his fair share by leading the people in revolting against exploitation of the British colony and payment of taxes (Gandhi, 2007).
