

OPERATION CONDOR ROMMEL'S SPY

John Eppler

'The most dangerous agent working in Egypt' is how A. W. Sansom described John Eppler in his book I Spied on Spies.

Raised as an adopted son in one of Cairo's most aristocratic families, John Eppler developed a taste for adventure when still in his teens. As a young man he went gold hunting in the depths of Africa. As war came nearer and nearer, as a German national he was approached by the Abwehr, to work for them in the 'second oldest profession'. His instinctive love of danger made spying attractive and in the end irresistible. He didn't do it for money—he had enough of that; he didn't do it out of patriotism—he was not enough of a scoundrel for that: he did it for the smell of excitement. This pursuit led him into the warrens of Istanbul, the precipitous mountains of Iraq, the quaking salt deserts of Iran, among the roaming, raiding tribes of the lower Himalayas, through Syria and Lybia and into the byways of intrigue and glamour in Cairo and Alexandria, even to Berlin and Bucharest.

His missions introduced him to brilliant trackers, ingenious spy-tradesmen, idiotic polemicists, dedicated intriguers and inept bureaucrats. He set up contact agents throughout the Middle East to help the Germans in their schemes to disrupt British Intelligence and military establishments. His bosses were the tops in their fields: Canaris, Aladin, Ribbentrop. It was he who was selected as the so-called Grand Mufti of Jerusalem's interpreter in his talks with Hitler in Berlin. It was he who was chosen to maintain contact in Cairo with Rommel at the time of Rommel's great offensive. To do this he had to cross the vast uncharted Lybian desert and sneak into Cairo unnoticed.

This is his true story, one of great physical adventure and danger, told with a frankness and directness unusual in a man of his chosen profession.
