

METHODOLOGIES OF EDUCATIONAL PLANNING

Traditional methodologies or approaches to educational planning

1. The man-power requirement approach

This approach gained a widespread use in 1960s and 1970s to project the manpower needs of the newly independent African countries after long periods of European domination, oppression and exploitation. The countries needed to develop indigenous manpower to support economic growth.

This approach implies the use of statistical inputs from economic sources in order to establish the present and the future need for manpower by educational and occupational categories.

The input data is compared with the output data expected from the supply of manpower to the labour market and the difference indicates a surplus or the need to cut back on education or training in selected subjects or deficiency requiring further investment in relevant areas of manpower development.

The manpower forecasting is very essential tool that is used to influence labour and educational policies at the national or the regional level.

The main objective of this approach is to ensure that there exists no manpower shortage in the labour market. To meet the objective manpower requirements, there's the need to train or educate the only the number of people needed.

As an approach used in the educational planning it aims to answer the following questions:
