ABSTRACT

Oral medicine is an area of dentistry which is constantly changing. Over the past several years Oral medicine has expanded in both scope and complexity. Oral medicine involves the diagnosis and management of complex diagnostic and medical disorders affecting the mouth and jaws. Current decade has witnessed enormous advances in the diagnostic oral medicine, which have moved from the laboratory to the dental clinics and hospitals. It is important that these advances do not remain as domain of the specialists in this field. Every general dental practitioner should be aware of recent advances in diagnostic oral medicine in order to provide a high level of care. This paper discusses the recent technological advances in the field of oral medicine that have made an impact on clinical dental practice.

INTRODUCTION

Oral medicine with respect to diagnostic decision making has seen remarkable advances over the years. Technical advances from biochemistry, immunology, histopathology, molecular biology, and optical physics have moved from laboratories into dental clinics and have combined together to radically change the way diagnosis is arrived at or confirmed. Advances have come about both through a greater degree of research activity in this field, and as a result of the application of recent technical developments which have permitted the investigation of questions which could not previously be approached. Radiology has participated in the recent trend toward computerized management in health service and has responded to the demand for cost-efficient and rapid communication between department of radiology and other dental specialties. But, with these recent technical innovations, the art of diagnosis has become much more of a science and the attitude of clinician has changed from clinicocentric to technocentric.

Advances in diagnostic oral medicine are aimed at reducing the morbidity and mortality associated with oral diseases. For example, despite numerous advances in treatment, the 5-year survival rate of patients with squamous cell carcinoma of head and neck has remained approximately 50% for the last 50 years.^[1] Based on the increasing incidence of head and neck cancers, problems associated with late diagnosis, and the public health dilemma they represent, it seems prudent to enact screening protocols to check at-risk people. Early diagnosis would allow for conservative therapeutic approaches with a brief recovery and a more favorable prognosis. This basic concept should be applied to all diseases affecting the oral cavity. Diagnosis should not be done at the first sign or symptom of a problem but on very routine and very frequent basis. Patients, at such screening visits, who show any indication of developing pathology should be more intensively examined and treated.

Changes are inevitable, even in the science foundational to the clinical practice of dentistry. Increased diversity and sophistication are developing in the areas of molecular biology, basic science, and social sciences. These will transform our traditional approaches to oral and dental disease management. In this paper, we shall see the recent technological advances in the field of oral medicine that may make an impact on clinical dental practice.

ADVANCES IN EARLY DETECTION OF CANCER

Precancers and early stage oral cancers may not be adequately identified by visual inspection alone and may be easily overlooked and neglected, even by highly trained
