The period from the accession of Theodosius to the Islamic conquest was a tumultuous time: a period of catastrophic defeat (Constantinople and the fall of the Empire in the West), as well as brilliant success (the Justinian reconquest and the final defeat of Sassanid Persia). The period is well studied in political and historical terms; however, the Imperial Roman Army, particularly its appearance and equipment, remains a neglected topic. As a result a number of misconceptions have arisen.

This authoritative follow-up to the author's successful Roman Military Equipment: The Late Empire not only corrects these misconceptions, it also provides a comprehensive survey of the military material of the period. The equipment, both offensive and defensive, is considered not simply as artefacts in isolation, but rather as pieces of a whole. Power is considered in conjunction with the reasons behind the development and adoption, as well as the usage, of the equipment. Finally, the book addresses the vexed question of what exactly was a shieldwall and how did it function, particularly in relation to enemy cavalry.

Ian Stephenson has an MSc in archaeology from the University of Newcastle and is widely published on the subject of Roman and Early Medieval warfare.
