Abstract

Knowledge bases, data bases and object-oriented systems (referred to in the paper as Object-Centered systems) all rely on attributes as the main construct used to associate properties to objects; among these, a fundamental role is played by the so-called part-whole relation. The representation of such a structural information usually requires a particular semantics together with specialized inference and update mechanisms, but rarely do current modeling formalisms and methodologies give it a specific, “first-class” dignity.

The main thesis of this paper is that the part-whole relation cannot simply be considered as an ordinary attribute; its specific ontological nature requires to be understood and integrated within data modeling formalisms and methodologies. On the basis of such an ontological perspective, we survey the conceptual modeling issues involving part-whole relations, and the various modeling frameworks provided by knowledge representation and object-oriented formalisms.

1 Introduction

Despite their different purposes and the tendency to mutual isolation, knowledge base, data base and object-oriented communities heavily rely on conceptual models which have a lot in common. They can be collectively classified as Object-Centered Systems, since they all organize the knowledge around the unifying abstract notion of objects. Classes, attributes and individuals could be considered as the main conceptual building blocks. A class is a description which gathers common features within a collection of individuals. From a logical point of view, it is a unary predicate which denotes a set of individuals.
