

Promising Directions and Methods for Population-Environment Analysis

Wolfgang Lutz¹

Abstract

The scientific analysis of the interactions between the human population and its natural environment is highly complex and full of traps. Studies in this field often focus on just one specific mechanism by which population changes impact on environmental changes (or vice versa) in very specific settings. A broad variety of analytical tools, ranging from GIS-based studies over qualitative/anthropological research to computer simulation models, and the fact that these studies need to draw on several scientific disciplines, tend to make such studies less straightforward than the more conventional studies within one discipline. The combination of this analytical complexity with the fact that population-environment interdependencies are often perceived as being of greatest importance for the future makes this field particularly vulnerable to advocacy groups that have another agenda than the scientific one. In this presentation I will try to review the field and summarize the findings of a recent survey of promising methods in population-environment analysis (published as a supplement to Population and Development Review, Vol. 28, 2002, edited by W. Lutz, A. Prskawetz, and W. C. Sanderson).

Introduction

No human being can exist without the air to breathe, clean water to drink, other species to supply the food to eat, and an atmosphere that protects from extraterrestrial radiation. These are all aspects of the environment. Increasingly, our natural environment is being altered by human action. Hence, there can be no doubt that population changes and environmental changes influence one another. Within the last few decades, this commonsensical observation has given rise to hundreds of scientific articles and reports, and the flow shows no sign of abating. The premise of this lecture is that this literature forms the groundwork for a new and interdisciplinary field of studies that we call population-environment (P-E) analysis.

Is P-E Analysis a Specific Field of Study?

This paper² is built on the premise that P-E analysis is indeed an emerging and distinct field of scientific analysis. What justifies this statement? There seem to be three criteria that in combination justify to call a certain body of research studies a distinct field: (a) a critical mass of people that work on these issues, (b) a set of joint research questions, and (c) a set of common methodologies. For some fields of scientific studies all three criteria are being met; for other fields only the first two. Take Japanese studies as an example of a field that nobody would challenge as being distinct. It clearly has a critical mass of scholars working on Japan and has a common research focus although there is hardly a common methodology. The range of methods applied may include linguistic, geographic, anthropological, and economic approaches. In other fields such as nuclear physics or demography, there is a set of standard methodologies in addition to the critical mass and the common object of analysis. How do these criteria apply to P-E analysis?
