

continues to tempt thinkers of each era. With his latest book, Stations of the Mind, William Glasser joins the list of those who have fallen prey to this temptation.

This book provides a framework for understanding human behavior and motivation by using a model called "Behavior: The Control of Perception Psychology (BCP)." This model is based on the assumption that all human actions are internally motivated. Behavior is purposeful and it is flexible because people control it according to what they perceive.

Glasser believes the match between desires—or stations in the mind—and incoming perceptions is the crucial motivator. He warns those charged with altering human behavior (teachers, administrators, parents) that the supposition that they can predict what satisfies these desires in others is often folly.

The behaviorists have never come to grips with their inability to consistently predict the satisfiers of these desires, Glasser argues. Those schooled in behaviorist theory will almost certainly challenge some of his arguments.

The book is thought-provoking and offers administrators and teachers suggestions for improving communication and motivation. But Stations of the Mind is not a book for quick solutions. It takes time to understand Glasser's jargon. To accept the model, one must largely exclude accepted behaviorist theory on human change.

Loyal readers of Glasser will be pleased to know that Stations of the Mind is consistent with the author's earlier writings, such as Reality Therapy and Schools Without Failure. His overall sense of faith in human beings and their ability to solve problems when alternatives are offered by another once again marks this as an optimistic work.

Glasser's use of anecdotes and his application of the model to problems such as drug addiction helps to explain ideas that at times seem very abstract. Although the book is well organized, the reader is often forced to refer back to the BCP diagram to fully comprehend the book's message.

Perhaps too complex to be viewed as a "how to" book, students of human behavior will enjoy thinking through Glasser's model for behavior in Stations of the Mind. By reaffirming or rejecting Glasser's framework, they might be able to create bridges with other theorists.
