Writing bureau	c. 1700-1800 in general	Construction and Materials	Reproductions
Historical background The writing bureau is a type of desk that was popular in the 17th and 18th centuries. It is characterized by its hinged top, which can be raised to reveal a writing surface. The bureau is often made of wood and features drawers and compartments for writing materials.	Construction and Materials The writing bureau is typically constructed from wood, such as oak or mahogany. It features a hinged top, drawers, and compartments for writing materials. The construction is often intricate, with decorative elements and fine joinery.	Reproductions Reproductions of writing bureaus are available in various materials and finishes. They often mimic the design and construction of the original pieces, but may lack the historical value and patina of the antique.
Signs of authenticity 1. The top is hinged and can be raised to reveal a writing surface. 2. The bureau is often made of wood and features drawers and compartments for writing materials. 3. The construction is intricate, with decorative elements and fine joinery. 4. The bureau is often found in a state of disrepair, with missing pieces and damage to the wood.
