I. INTRODUCTION

Observing the behavior of young children is the beginning of understanding young children, the starting point of carrying out various activities, the embodiment of teachers' professional quality, and the basis of high-quality early childhood education. Is the observation of young children's behavior just a look? How to observe and record the behavior of young children? Is the interpretation of young children's behavior merely an analysis of their behavior? How to interpret children's behavior appropriately? Therefore, to observe young children, people must first understand how to observe and record their behaviors. Second, it's a must to understand the ways to interpret their mental activities and development levels through their behaviors.

II. CHILDREN'S BEHAVIOR OBSERVATION AND ANALYSIS IS THE CORE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF CHILDREN'S TEACHERS

The observation, recording and analysis of children's behaviors are not only the daily work of children's teachers, but also the embodiment of their core qualities. The core accomplishment has specialty uniqueness and foundation. The core accomplishment of kindergarten teachers is unique to kindergarten teachers and is not possessed by teachers of other ages. At the same time, the core accomplishment is also reflected in that it is the basis of other qualities of preschool teachers.

In the "Professional Standards for Kindergarten Teachers", it is mentioned that teachers should have "the planning and implementation of educational activities", "encouragement and evaluation, communication and cooperation", "support and guidance of game activities" and "reflection and development ability". Although there is no mention of teachers' ability to observe children's behavior, the development of the above-mentioned ability is based on teachers' ability to observe children's behavior. The reason why the observation, recording and analysis of children's behaviors are regarded as the core accomplishment of children's teachers is determined by the object of children's education — children. Children's age characteristics determine their learning methods and characteristics. Children's learning is integrated in activities and life through perception, experience and operation. This requires teachers to pay attention to observing children's behavior and the causes of behavior in one day's life. Teachers are urged to constantly "discover" children and "interpret" children in practical activities. On this basis, teachers are required to reflect on the suitability of their own educational behavior and improve the quality of education. Therefore, the purpose of observing and recording children's behavior is not to simply record children's behavior, but to reflect on their own teaching behavior and promote their professional development on the basis of reading children, and finally realize high-quality teaching work. How to scientifically observe and record children's behavior so that the observation record text is faithful to the children's on-site activities? How can the interpretation of young children meet the real level of development? This requires teachers to learn how to observe records and master the main points of analyzing and interpreting children's behavior.

At present, kindergarten teachers mostly use written observation and recording methods, such as anecdotal recording method, live detailed recording method, etc., which are simple, easy to operate and can provide original, detailed and open materials. Therefore, written observation and recording method has become the most commonly used method for kindergarten teachers to observe children's behavior. The author combines the above cases to analyze how to record and analyze the written observation records.
