

PSYCHOLOGY AND RELIGION

Alfred Darmanin S.J.

The purpose of this article is to clarify the relationship between psychology and religion, to bring out their mutual complementarity, to indicate avenues for reciprocal contribution and hopefully to build a solid bridge between these two areas of our human existence.

We shall start by investigating the possible and the ideal types of relationship between religion and psychology. Certain methodological issues arising out of their corresponding disciplines will be clarified. A psychological critique of religion will then be discussed followed by the contributions made by psychology to religion. Finally, current trends or schools in psychology will be briefly presented as signs of bridging the psycho-religious gap.

Preliminary remarks

One cannot really speak about the relationship between psychology and religion because there is no one psychology as there is no one religion. Various schools in psychology abound just as different religions proliferate. In this article we shall include in our consideration the three major approaches in psychology, namely, psycho-analytic, behaviouristic, and humanistic, together with the main world religions, namely, Christianity, Judaism, Islam, Hinduism and Buddhism.

Even with this restriction, the task of relating these psychologies with these religions remains too ambitious. Hence, while retaining throughout our reflection these varieties of psychological and religious experiences, we shall focus more on Christianity in its relationship to the principal schools in psychology. This does not mean that what is stated here applies only to the Christian tradition, but that our main reference points originate from Christian concepts and experience.

For the purpose of this article, we adopt the following definition of religion: "a lived and practical relationship with a superhuman being (or beings) in whom one believes." (Thouless). As a general definition of psychology, we propose "the science that studies human behaviour, seeking to formulate the laws for such behaviour, to explain its origin and eventually to modify it."
