The authors report the development of the Religious Commitment Inventory—10 (RCI-10), used in 6 studies. Sample sizes were 155, 132, and 150 college students; 240 Christian church-attending married adults; 468 undergraduates (including among others) Buddhists ( $n = 52$ ), Muslims ( $n = 12$ ), Hindus ( $n = 10$ ), and nonreligious ( $n = 117$ ); and 217 clients and 52 counselors in a secular or 1 of 6 religious counseling agencies. Scores on the RCI-10 had strong estimated internal consistency, 3-week and 5-month test-retest reliability, construct validity, and discriminant validity. Exploratory (Study 1) and confirmatory (Studies 4 and 6) factor analyses identified 2 highly correlated factors, suggesting a 1-factor structure as most parsimonious. Religious commitment predicted response to an imagined robbery (Study 2), marriage (Study 4), and counseling (Study 6).

Interest in religion and spirituality has increased dramatically recently both within culture in general and within psychology. Substantial literatures now describe connections between religion and mental health (Miller, 1999; Richards & Bergin, 1997, 2000; Shafrański, 1996) and between religion and physical health

(George, Larson, Keonig, & McCullough, 2000; Keonig, McCullough, & Larson, 2004; Plante & Sherman, 2001). These research findings are relevant for counseling and counseling health psychology.

Religion and spirituality have been hypothesized to affect both the process (Richards & Bergin, 1997) and the outcomes (e.g., increased mental and physical health; George et al., 2000; Keonig et al., 2001; Larson, Swyers, & McCullough, 1998) of counseling. According to the consensus document from the National Institute for Healthcare Research (Hill et al., 1998), spirituality is defined as “the feelings, thoughts, experiences, and behaviors that arise from a search for the sacred” (p. 21). Hill et al. (1998) defined religion as

(a) the feelings, thoughts, experiences, and behaviors that arise from a search for the sacred . . . and/or (b) a search or quest for a non-sacred goal (such as identity, belongingness, meaning, health, or wellness) in a context that has [as] its primary goal the facilitation of (a), and (c) the means and methods (e.g., rituals or prescribed behaviors) of the search that receive validation and support from within an identifiable group of people. (p. 21)

Substantial research supports the generally positive, yet sometimes negative, impact of religion on mental health (for reviews, see Keonig et al., 2001; McCullough, Larson, & Worthington, 1998) and on physical health (for reviews, see Keonig et al., 2001). Furthermore, there is evidence that religious considerations are
