

The Theory of Shrinkproofing of Wool

Part VI: Identification by Light Microscopy of Scale Masking and Spot Welding of Fibers by Polymer Deposits¹

J. H. Bradbury

Chemistry Department, Australian National University, Canberra, Australia

Abstract

Light microscopy has been used to examine polyglycine and poly(hexamethylene sebacamide) deposited on the fiber by polymerization of the appropriate monomers and also polymethylmethacrylate deposited from solution in acetone. Two types of deposits occur: (i) a thin, discontinuous layer which covers most of the cuticle and is observed by mounting in "Sellotape" and (ii) irregularly placed, large pieces of polymer which cover only a very small fraction of the cuticle and are observed by mounting in water. The former is produced by polymerization of monomers in situ and effects shrinkproofing by scale masking, and the latter is produced by treatments with preformed polymer, in which case shrinkproofing is due to spot welding of fibers. It is thus possible to distinguish by simple microscopic examination of the treated fibers between the two different types of shrinkproofing produced by polymer deposition. It is concluded that deposition of preformed polymer by the usual techniques results in formation of irregularly placed, large pieces of polymer and that shrinkproofing is achieved by means of spot welding of fibers.

Introduction

There are two methods by which shrinkproofing of wool can be brought about by the deposition of polymer on the surface of the fiber. In the first method the fibers are covered by an adherent layer of polymer which covers a large proportion of the cuticle, as is the case with polyglycine [1, 3, 7, 8, 9] or polysiloxanes [2, 13, 15], and this produces masking of the scale structure, with decrease of the directional friction effect and decrease of the felting shrinkage. The second method, the so-called spot welding [6, 19, 21] or fiber bonding method [15], consists of the bonding together of fibers within the fabric by means of irregularly placed deposits of resin which cover only a small fraction of the cuticle and are of such size as to be readily seen in the light microscope.
