ON JUVENILE CRIME AS IT AFFECTS COMMERCE, AND THE BEST MEANS OF REPRESSING IT.

By JESSE SMYTH, B.A., ONE OF HER MAJESTY'S INSPECTORS OF SCHOOLS.

That public morals largely affect the welfare of industry and commerce will be readily admitted. The same reasons which determine us to select honest, sober, and trustful servants prompt the employers of labour, and make it their interest to moralise the working classes. Apart from actual losses by theft, the demoralisation of workmen causes a loss in the value of labour, which cannot be estimated at less than many millions per annum. Bodily inertness, carelessness, indolence, unskillfulness, and waste, are among the many results of lax morals; all of them preying upon and forming drawbacks to the productive power of the country, from which all social as well as industrial interests necessarily suffer. I believe it to be capable of demonstration, that this country loses far more every year by the vice of drunkenness alone, than the whole amount of the taxes. Though illustrations of a principle so obviously true are scarcely needed, I may refer to Switzerland, as a remarkable instance of the commercial prosperity which may be attained by the combined morality and skill of a people who seem to have been almost divested by nature of the physical elements which most of all minister to productive wealth. It may be said, that artistic and productive energies and success are dependent far more on industry than on morals; but I apprehend that as a general rule these are inseparably linked together, and that a workman, no matter in what handicraft, combining diligence and demoralisation as his characteristics, if such an one exists, is an individual anomaly, and not a specimen of a class large enough in the slightest degree to affect my position. It may be less obvious that this principle touches the immediate question I have ventured to submit to your attention on this evening, namely, the treatment of juvenile criminals. But if demoralisation injures the vital powers of industry, and commerce suffers with them, commerce is clearly concerned in uprooting the sources of crime, and, therefore, in the reformation of juvenile criminals; for who are juvenile offenders but those who people the nursery and form the brood of future crime. I am speaking less now of the actual effect of crimes on commerce than of the widely extended contagion and demoralisation which result from the existence (especially in town communities) of a criminal class. Not only does that class deteriorate all who come within its contact and companionship, but the very frequency of crimes, and the minor violations of order and decency, render the neighbourhood familiar with their commission, which familiarity is itself demoralising, and so the circle spreads. And I may here remark that the contagious influence of bad morals and examples is never so effective or disastrous as among children.

Allow me in the next place to call your attention to the direct loss of property by one sort of crime, that which constitutes almost the entire criminality of the juvenile classes, namely, theft.

It is a well-known fact, frequently stated by the most experienced and best-informed witnesses, many of whom have recently deposed to it before the Committee of the House of Commons on this subject, that in most large towns there exists a distinct class of young persons and children regularly trained and educated in the art of depredation. Not only in London, but throughout the country, the craft of pocket-picking is taught, practised, and carried on, almost as systematically and artistically as any honest vocation; and the evidence abounds that our common schools are often effective schools for the furtherance and education of all branches of the thieving profession. As an instance of the direct loss to capital employed in commerce, and especially in manufacture, I may mention the bowd weft trade, which prevails so largely throughout the cotton districts both of Scotland, Ireland, and parts of the north of England. This weft is stolen in great measure by children, and not only is it a loss in the first instance to the owner, but his own stolen property enters the market, in the shape of cheap manufacture, to compete with him.

Many calculations have been made of the first loss sustained by thefts in large manufacturing towns—not a title of which I need hardly say, are ever detected. I have but little faith in statistics of which the data are necessarily vague and hidden; but in order to give some slight idea of the magnitude of the system of depredation which is now going on among the juvenile classes alone, in large towns, I will mention that I have, through the aid of my friend Mr. William Rathbone, been supplied with a detailed statement as regards Liverpool, by Major Greig, commissioner of the police force. The gross results are, that in 1854 there were 1,035 commitments of children for felony, of which 428 were by children under twelve years of age. The amount of property thus detected to have been stolen was £3,225, but Major Greig adds that the probable value of property also stolen, but for which the thieves have not been apprehended, is £5,314, making a total of £8,540 known to have been taken by juvenile offenders, of which £1,367 only has been recovered. Now, if a system of thieving be regularly carried on in Liverpool, or in any other town, by young thieves, who can make it so profitable a business as to afford a loss on their gains of £1,367, and are likewise willing to submit to 1,000 imprisonments per annum, we may deduce some notion, not only of the extent of the depredations committed, but of the depth and magnitude of the depravity engendered, to which these facts are but an outward index.

I have received some very interesting details from Leeds, Cheltenham, and other towns, not certainly deploring so extreme a case as I believe Liverpool presents, but still affording ample ground for the only point I am now endeavouring to establish, namely, how largely property suffers and morals are depraved by the extent of juvenile delinquency. I may mention that the criminal calendars forwarded to me disclose a fact I have everywhere (and in regard to all ages) found to be the case—namely, that the criminal class are not the least instructed class. I observe that those children committed who can neither read nor write, last year, did not exceed 28 per cent. of the whole number in the calendars I have examined.
