

inevitably entails some federal control. The problem for the future, according to the author, is to establish enough federal supervision to assure the maintenance of minimum standards, and yet to avoid a degree of centralization which will lead to a topheavy bureaucracy and to excessive resentment on the part of the states and localities.

Principles and Methods of Distributing Federal Aid for Education is not so much a record of things past as a blue-print of things to come. After careful consideration of the educational needs and financial abilities of the several states, the simple conclusion is reached that many states cannot provide adequate educational opportunities without federal aid. It is taken for granted that there will be a further expansion of such aid, and three plans for assuring a "defensible foundation program" in all states are presented. The ultimate federal grants required would range from $576,000,000 to $1,979,000,000 a year, depending upon the extent to which the states participate, and whether the grants are used solely for making possible minimum standards, or for the further purposes of equalizing educational costs and assisting the states in readjusting their tax systems. Some twenty-five years of gradual improvement would be required for full development of any one of these plans, and the initial annual grant should not exceed fifteen per cent of the ultimate grant.

The first of the books here reviewed is as carefully documented and as scrupulously objective as a doctoral dissertation should be. In view of Dr. Williams' official connections (formerly with F.E.R.A. and now with W.P.A.), perhaps he was wise in avoiding all controversy. But the reviewer could have wished for more discussion of the philosophy and the consequences of the colossal programs which are so matter-of-factly presented. The second work is more significant than its length, price, and paper binding would suggest. It was prepared by an eminently competent staff, and is the result of exhaustive study. It is intended largely for experts, making extensive use of tables, charts, technical terms, and statistical symbols. Nevertheless, the explanations, comments, and conclusions are lucidly written, and should prove of interest to every layman who is concerned with educational problems.
