

The State of Deterrence in International Politics Today

PATRICK M. MORGAN

It is important to take stock of deterrence, in theory and practice, to assess where it is now and where it might be headed in security affairs. When the Cold War ended, analysts suggested almost immediately that the utility, role and conduct of deterrence would be changing. We are now better positioned to see how and where this is the case. Less obvious but soon emphasized was that deterrence theory might need adjustments as well, that it had been significantly shaped by the Cold War environment. Efforts to develop a robust theory had encouraged treatment of it as an abstract phenomenon, as if it would be basically the same everywhere and at any particular time. The impact of context had been underemphasized, even neglected, and the context had markedly shifted.

This paper grapples with a series of tasks. One is to highlight ways in which deterrence, since 1990, has been molded by surrounding conditions and circumstances. Another is to describe where deterrence now stands as a resource in security affairs. This means noting not just changes that have occurred, but the institutional, political, and intellectual inertia behind Cold War deterrence that has continued to be attractive and has been difficult to alter or eliminate. Nevertheless, international politics has changed and we have to ask how this affects or should affect deterrence. What does deterrence, in theory and practice, look like now?

As a quick overview we can say that there is:

- insufficient appreciation of how and why Cold War conceptions of deterrence are of limited relevance now and also of the ways in which Cold War deterrence thinking remains relevant;
- significant improvement in conceptions of how deterrence can be applied in anti-terrorism efforts;
- spreading appreciation of the shrinking role and utility of nuclear deterrence;
- more attention needed on political and normative contexts in assessing deterrence today;
- a burgeoning effort to reexamine deterrence in regard to cyber-security concerns;
- too little attention being given to the complexities of collective deterrence and to the alternative models of collective deterrence;
- inadequate understanding of extended deterrence today;
- insufficient use of an arms control perspective on security management in response to rising interdependence in international politics.

Deterrence is an enduring important recourse in international politics. However, its application and specific implementation must be adjusted to major shifts in the
