Subcommittee on Health, 1989 Health Insurance: The Trade-Off Between Risk Pooling and Moral Hazard, 1989 Choosing economically optimal health insurance coverage involves a trade off between risk reduction and the overuse of health care The economic purpose of insurance is to reduce financial uncertainty or risk the more health insurance lowers the risk the greater will be the increase in social well being But increases in health insurance also increase the amount of medical care demand because insurance lowers the out of pocket cost of health care the larger the demand response of medical care to cost sharing the greater the decrease in social well being due to the purchase of too much health care This study examines this trade off empirically by estimating both the demand for health insurance and the demand for health services It relies on data from a randomized controlled trial of the cost sharing s effects on the use of health services and on the health status for a general nonelderly under age 65 population
