BUSINESS ASPECTS OF HEALTH PROMOTION

Work Site Smoking Cessation: A Meta-Analysis of Long-Term Quit Rates from Controlled Studies. K. John Fisher, Russell E. Glasgow, James R. Terborg. Journal of Occupational Medicine, May 1990; 32(5):429-439. Data from 20 studies of worksite smoking cessation programs were subjected to meta-analysis. Program success was measured by the ratio of employees who abstained from smoking for one year to the number who started the cessation programs (Quit Rate - QR). Results indicate that the average member of a worksite smoking cessation program is 58 percent more likely to quit smoking than a corresponding member in a control program. The average QR from all interventions was 13 percent. Heavy smokers (more than 20 cigarettes a day) and workers at smaller worksites (less than 250 employees) were more likely to quit than other worksite program participants. Highest QRs were associated with programs that were simple, included a group component, and shared company and employee time. (64 references) (Smoking Program Implementation)

Synergism in Work Site Adoption of Employee Assistance Programs and Health Promotion Activities. Terry C. Blum, Paul M. Roman, Linda Patrick. Journal of Occupational Medicine, May 1990; 32(5):461-467. Data from the 1985 National Survey of Worksite Health Promotion Activities were used to examine the dual existence of employee assistance programs (EAP) and health promotion activities (HPA). The term synergism was used to mean that the adoption of either an EAP or HPA may lead to the adoption of the other. While 65 percent of all worksites offered at least one HPA, over 83 percent of worksites with EAPs offered HPAs. Conversely, only 46 percent of worksites with at least one HPA also had an EAP. More specifically, over 35 percent of all worksites offered their employees some sort of smoking cessation program, but 47.6 percent of worksites with an EAP offered smoking cessation programs. Although unionized worksites were 11.4 percent less likely to offer smoking cessation programs, those companies with both unions and an EAP were more likely to offer each of the nine health promotion activities studied. Prevalence of an EAP predicted the existence of an HPA fourfold better than vice versa. (20 references) (Program Implementation, Corporate Culture)

HEALTH ASPECTS OF HEALTH PROMOTION

Socioeconomic Status Differences in Vulnerability to Undesirable Life Events. Jane D. McLeod, Ronald C. Kessler. Journal of Health and Social Behavior, June 1990; 31(2):162-172. Pooled data from five epidemiologic surveys confirmed that persons of lower socioeconomic status (SES) are more vulnerable to stressful life events than their higher SES counterparts. As in other studies, income was the component of SES that was associated most consistently with exposure to stressful life events. However, constrained finances was not the only predictor of vulnerability. Ill health and love loss were other conditions which were statistically significant in characterizing persons of lower SES as being more vulnerable. Of 48 correlations drawn between SES and stressful life events, 20 were statistically significant ($p = .05$). Other factors correlating with lower SES were separation/divorce and death of a loved one. Thus, differences in vulnerability to life events were not solely the result of constrained finances, but reflected more pervasive disadvantages inherent in the lives of persons who occupy lower-status positions. Changes in Risk Factors and the Decline in Mortality from Cardiovascular Disease — The Framingham Heart Study. Pamela A. Sytkowski, William B. Kannel, Ralph B. D'Agostino. New England Journal of Medicine, June 1990; 322(23):1635-1641. Variables were studied to explain the 40 percent decrease in mortality from cardiovascular disease in the United States over a 30-year period. Three cohorts of more than 450 men
