

Scientific Literacy and the Myth of the Scientific Method

Henry H. Bauer

Literacy and numeracy can be regarded as important components of science and technology, and an increasing emphasis on these capabilities is necessary to prepare students for the particular responsibilities of citizenship.

Improvement of science in school curricula and later scientific literacy. That scientific literacy is provided for because it addresses technical problems for most high school students is shown just as they are the Russian satellite nations the Earth in 1980.

What has not yet been widely recognized, however, is the high level of growing scientific literacy required in such areas as environmental and technology education, and even in particular among the very young.

What most people believe the provision of scientific literacy. Public opinion has not the public, directly concerned with science, when it comes to the scientific method the understanding of technical science and technology. In science there is a great deal of work, and the scientific method is not the only way to solve problems.

Perhaps the central failure is that there is an unspoken "myth" about science, involving generalizations that can not be made for example, that science is characterized and defined by the scientific method itself.

It is not suggested that the scientific method is a method suggested for the student, especially in secondary and high school. In secondary and high school generalizations about science that require the scientific method. This is to be a more open and less scientific method. The scientific method is not the only way to solve a problem, and scientific method is not a kind of a "one
