

Medical Physics & Biomedical Engineering

Technology plays an increasingly dominant role in medicine, and doctors are finding that an ability to understand and utilise new instrumentation and techniques encountered in hospitals is becoming essential. The integrated B.Sc. in Medical Physics and Biomedical Engineering provides a comprehensive overview of the technology involved in modern healthcare, and introduces medical students to the fundamental physical principles on which it is based. The course will be particularly valuable to medical students considering careers in Diagnostic Radiology, and also in Surgery. The degree programme is based at the Department of Medical Physics & Biomedical Engineering, located in the Malet Place Engineering Building

AIMS & OBJECTIVES

The aim of the integrated degree offered by the Department of Medical Physics & Bioengineering is to fill a void in the majority of MBBS degrees which typically contain little or no medical physics material. The course is suitable for students at any stage of the MBBS programme. Although most courses are the same as those offered to Physics B.Sc. students, no significant background knowledge beyond A-Level Physics and Mathematics (or equivalent standard) is essential. Students without A-Level Mathematics (or equivalent) are still permitted to take the course, although some additional background reading will be required. Our integrated students are also provided with informal tutorials every week which enable them to discuss matters arising from the course material, and to supplement their background knowledge of physics and mathematics. Having completed integrated degrees, several of our past students have elected to pursue PhD degrees within our department before returning to medical school.

COURSE STRUCTURE

Students are not overburdened with lectures (an average of 9 hours per week), giving adequate time to understand the technical issues and fundamental principles through background reading, problem sheets, and a research project. The IBSc students share most of their courses with a small number of Physics and Electronic Engineering students, which provides a stimulating environment with a mix of relevant backgrounds akin to that encountered in hospital care and medical research. The total number of students in each class is generally quite small (typically less than 30), which provides an informal, friendly atmosphere, with more opportunities for personal contact with teaching staff than many medical students have previously experienced. Students will be required to take six lecture courses, plus a project selected from those offered each year by the many research groups working in the Medical Physics & Bioengineering Department and UCL Hospitals. The courses will be chosen from the list given below, including the two medical imaging courses and an introductory mathematics course which are compulsory. There are no pre-requisites for individual courses.

COURSE UNIT INFORMATION

There are no pre-requisites for any of the individual courses. The exact choice of optional courses may be subject to timetabling constraints. Students take six of the lecture courses from the list given below, including the three courses which are compulsory:
