

One-line Poems and Longer, but Not Much

By WILLIAM COLE

Reading "One-line Literary Portraits" by William S. Hodgson (Chapinger Publishing Co.), I came across something that I was used to: Wordsworth's daughter. He was talking about prose rhythm, and singled out his favorite line, Emerson's "The stars, the stars enveloping our fugitive stars." This reminded me of a line I had copied down from John Barth's "The Last-Faded Factor," "When a dead smile sweet at night that stains in the heat of the sun." These lines, I said, aren't prose, they're poems. The more most academics would look the out of the balls at the line, but there is such a thing as a one-line poem.

To the skeptic: What is a poem? Definitions abound. One old dictionary tells me "... a metrical composition, esp. of elevated character." Why not of date. Another power and defines a poem as "an arrangement of words ... in a style more imaginative than ordinary speech," but of course. The quotation books have dozens of further definitions: Coleridge's "the best words in their best order," Shelley's "the record of the best and happiest moments of the best and happiest minds." A poem is unconcealed observation, beautiful shorthand, Keats said that poetry "should strike the reader as a revelation of his own highest thoughts, and appear almost a reminiscence." It should confirm your suspicion, as does a successful novel, that the author does say that a poem has to be of any specified length; a poem is a statement, and all that matters is how tellingly that statement is made.

Many one-line poems are really only one sentence long, but are arranged on the page to be two or three lines. When "Dancing" by D. H. Lawrence: "There is nothing to look at any more, / everything has been seen to death." Almost any rhyme—a form I dislike—is a broken-down sentence: "The glides low petals / ride on the pond surface / like a flower boat" or some such bit.

I can't say who the first poet of one-line poems was, but I know that Apollinaire wrote them. But most of his are more shaped poems, or concrete poems, than legitimate one-liners. The contemporary poet, John Hollander, has a one-line poem about Apollinaire. It goes "A Poet is in." That's it. Closure unless you already know that Apollinaire was born in Saint-Denis.

William Cole's anthologies include "Eight Lines and Under" and the recent "Poems One Line and Longer."

The Guest Word

Ralph Hodgson's "Collected Poems" (The Martin's Press) concludes with a section he titles "Typing Scripts." All short, many of one line. Most, however, are more spellings than poems. "The work was not my best invention." But I like "The Feet comes back in the month with blood," and "Geesty. Years, Geesty" the one line "When darkness darked the street— / There's a poem!"

Your friend, a respected poet, thought enough of his one-liners to include five in his "Collected Poems" (The Swallow Press). This he calls "The Shadow's Song":

I am beside you, now,
And here's "The Aspen's Song"
The summer holds me here.

Knowing of my long-time interest in short poems, R. V. Griffin, the editor of my favorite poetry magazine, Verse (1118 K Street, Torrance, Calif., 90501) was the only collection I'd seen so far of one-line poems. "But It Is Poetry" a magazine pamphlet edited by David Jackson, going for $1 (Box 141, Middleboro Community, Middleboro, Mass., 01545). It has 62 one-liners, a page apiece. I like Philip Dewey's "Thunder":

The tall, freckled boy called by four girls.

And "Notes on Telephone Work" by Felix Fulfink and Donna Anderson: Messages have grown hands long.

Not content with having introduced me to one-liners, Mr. Griffin introduced a few weeks later with a gift of a collection of one-line poems, "Seven Solidity: I give for less than I take in the one-liners." Called "Shortcuts" (Magazine of One-Line Poems, edited by Joyce Kilford, Box 204, Iowa City, Iowa) reimprinted, one word to a page, and stapled into—guess what?—a notebook. Sure for a while. No, I can't remember these poems, although there is a certain rustic charm to George Manning's "Salt." This moved me to check "The Guinness Book of Records" for the shortest poem, and sure enough there it was: "Good" by Anne Lamotte. To which I can only say "pooh!"

This one word stuff brings to mind those polls conducted from time to time to determine the most beautiful word in the English language. One conducted by Wilfred Funk came up with "dawn," I believe. Henry James liked the combination "summer afternoon." I've told that language teacher a beautiful word is never chosen for "either door." I like "rain," "light." To disagree about either door, three years ago my wife and I were engaged in a baby, and we'd been going through that delightful job of choosing a name, looking for something both unusual and pleasing for something I said, "If it's a girl, how about 'Dor'?" Looking for a piece of paper with "Cecilia" on it. "Lucy," she said. "What's it from?" "Parsons," I quickly replied. "Old Parsons." "But if it's a boy?" I took the piece of paper, and on the other side wrote "Cecilia." She thought that was too exotic, but added Cecilia to the list of girl's names.

But back to one-liners. Wendell Phillips has written many great short poems, but never, that I know of, has he purposely written any one-line poems. But in the gentleman's edition from his notebooks, "Stanzas for the Fire" (Doubleday), there are many. They weren't included as one-line poems, but were noted down as phrases and sentences for possible later use or development. For example:

I sleep like a rock dog; I can't find my life.

And:

Another woman; a change of years.

And:

I would be with the wind, in the change and calm of this summer day.

And in the same notebook he has a judgment that could apply to the cause of the one-line poem: "On small poems: a thing may be small but it need not be a name; it may be a cipher in the shape of the mind's eye or a pain in the neck." ■
