

Influence of Mental Health and Substance Use Problems and Criminogenic Risk on Outcomes in Serious Juvenile Offenders

Carol A. Schubert, M.P.H., Edward P. Mulvey, Ph.D., Cristie Glasheen, Ph.D.

1. What is the thesis or main idea of this article?

The main idea of this article is to look at the relationship between mental health in juveniles and juvenile offending. There is little research to show that mental health specifically causes a youth to commit a crime, but there is the idea that it could be a factor. A large population of the juveniles incarcerated currently have one or more mental health problems, more than that of the "outside" youth population, anywhere from 50 to 70% of incarcerated youth compared to 9 to 21% of an incarcerated youth. Many believe that mental health issues could be a criminogenic risk factor to committing crimes, they discuss how youth with depression and or dysthymia may experience feelings of hopelessness and may not be able to think about future consequences leading to a heightened risk of offending.

2. What is the hypothesis?

There were three questions/ areas looked at within this study, these consisted of evaluating the association of mental health problems on three distinct outcomes, testing whether having a mental health problem contributed any unique explanatory power regarding these outcomes over and above criminogenic risk markers, and examined whether mental health problems moderated the relationship between criminogenic risk markers and outcomes (Schubert et. al., 2011, p. 3).

3. Briefly explain if the prior literature (reviewed in the article) supports this hypothesis?

The prior literature discusses the fact that mental health does have something to do with youth who have committed a crime, they discuss the idea of it being a criminogenic risk factor. The previous literature talks about the idea that if we can address the mental health issue within the youth than we can decrease the risk of youth involvement in crime and increase their involvement in prosocial behaviors. The previous literature also states that there needs to be more research completed on separating mental health and crime in youth since there are so many factors involved.

4. What methods are used to test this hypothesis and are they qualitative or quantitative?

For this study 1,354 adolescents were chosen from Philly, PA from the ages of 14 to 17 who had been adjudicated or found guilty of a serious offense, all females were chosen as well as any youth who had been referred to the adult system, males were capped off at 15% for any drug offenses so that there was no overrepresentation of this offense. Baseline interviews were given right after the adjudication hearing and follow-up interviews occurred every 6 months for the first three years and then they were given once a year after that for seven years. 949 participants were included in the results, taking out any adult transfers or people with missing information. 121 possible risk markers related to offending were given, a PCA was used to reduce these to a set of uncorrelated factors reflecting the risk for future offending. Assessment tools were then used to show any signs of mental health problems that were present in the youth, from here
