Self-Study Research and the Development of Teacher Educators' Professional Identities

MIEKE LUNENBERG, FRED KORTHAGEN & ROSANNE ZWART
VU University, Amsterdam, the Netherlands

ABSTRACT This article presents the results of a study on the project 'Teacher Educators Study Their Own Practices'. Nine teacher educators participated and conducted a self-study into their own practices. The leading question of this article is whether their self-studies contributed to the development of their professional identities. Data sources were digital logbooks, exit interviews, and follow-up questionnaires. The results show that conducting self-study research supports theoretical growth, ongoing development, the production of knowledge, and the enhancement of self-confidence. What these results could mean for the teacher educators themselves and their practices, and for the professional community of teacher educators, is discussed in the final section of this article.

Introduction

Since the 1990s, a growing number of teacher educators, especially in North America and Australia, have been studying their own practices. Developments in teacher education (such as the growing awareness of the need to connect theory and practice, and the increasing influence of constructivism) have led to the wish of teacher educators to study the processes involved in the new attempts to improve teacher education practices. In the tradition of teacher research (Corey, 1983; Stenhouse, 1975; Whitehead, 1989; McNiff & Whitehead, 2006), they started to focus their research on their own teacher education practices. Zeichner (1999) stated: 'The birth of the self-study in the teacher education movement around 1990 has been probably the single most significant development ever in the field of teacher education research' (p. 8).

There appears to be an important difference between what is required in teacher research and what is required in teacher educator research. While most teacher research focuses solely on improving the teacher's own practice, teacher educator research has the same focus, but also serves a second goal. As most teacher educators are also academics, they are expected to contribute to general knowledge development through publications in academic journals. Indeed, an analysis by Korthagen & Lunenberg (2004) showed that during the previous two decades, self-studies by teacher educators appeared to be productive both for the teacher educators themselves and for the development of formal knowledge on teacher education.

In conclusion, characteristics of this so-called self-study research by teacher educators are that (1) the research question is based on a fascination or problem rooted in the researcher's own practice; (2) the research subject is related to relevant literature; (3) the data collection and data analyses are carefully described; and (4) the significance of the findings to others is discussed (see for extensive descriptions of quality criteria for self-study research: Ballough & Pinnegar, 2001; LaBoskey, 2004). Self-study research on the part of teacher educators can thus be defined as systematic research and reflection on these teacher educators' own practices, leading to both an improvement of these practices and a contribution to the general knowledge base of teacher education (Zeichner, 1999).
