Tomato molecular biology – special collection of papers for molecular horticulture

Graham B. Seymour^{1*} and Jocelyn K. C. Rose²

Tomato (Solanum lycopersicum) is the second most important vegetable crop globally, after potato, with about 100 million tons fresh fruit being grown on 3.7 million hectares (FAO 2021), and is of great importance in the human diet due to the large amount of fruit consumed. The fruit are eaten both fresh and, equally importantly, as a processed product in puree, soups and canned products. They provide an important dietary source of vitamins and minerals, such as K, Fe and Ca, and are known for the large number of health promoting secondary metabolites, including the carotenoid and flavonoid pigments that give the fruit a spectrum of yellow, red and orange colours.

Tomato commercial production and breeding is supported by a long history of research that has led to the identification of regions of the tomato genome that control a host of important traits including disease resistance, yield and fruit quality. The first tomato genome was sequenced a decade ago and the sequence is now in its fifth iteration with 100's of genome sequences from a wide spectrum of wild species crop relatives and cultivated varieties. The diploid nature of tomato, genomic resources and a wide range of single gene mutants make it an excellent model plant to study dicot crop species and especially those with fleshy fruits.

In this special collection, we bring together a range of papers to explore the latest developments and scientific insights in tomato molecular biology. This brief editorial summarises the key features of the papers that collectively set the scientific discovery in the context of plant development and highlight relevance to horticulture.

Plant architecture is a critical determinant of crop productivity and influences, among other factors, the number of reproductive shoots. The hormonal control of plant architecture has been the subject of studies for well over 100 years, but recent advances in genomics have accelerated our understanding of its molecular basis. Tomato is an especially useful model to investigate the association between plant architectural features and their impact on crop performance. Side branching in tomato is undesirable and results in unwanted labour and management costs. Three main phytohormone classes are known to influence side branching: auxins, cytokinins (CKs) and strigolactones. Auxin inhibits the outgrowth of axillary buds and maintains apical dominance. CKs act antagonistically to auxin, suppressing apical dominance and allowing release of axillary buds from dormancy. Auxin modulates CK concentration by repressing its levels, while strigolactones affect bud inhibition by modulating auxin transport. In addition, there seems to be some interplay between CK and strigolactone levels, and the overall picture highly complex. In this special issue, Pino et al. (2022) report that tomato plants overexpressing the cytokinin-deactivating gene CYTOKININ OXIDASE 2 (CKOX2) showed excessive growth of axillary shoots, which is opposite to the phenotype expected of plants with reduced CK content. The authors suggest that CKs cause their paradoxical effects on branching by disturbing auxin status, and by altering the expression of genes associated with branching and CK homeostasis. The study highlights the intricacy of
