This article is part of "An STS Focus on Design" research project in the Department of Science and Technology Studies at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. It is funded by the NSF Science and Technology Studies Program (Grant #9818207).

I would like to thank Ned Woodhouse, Ron Eglash, and Langdon Winner for insightful discussions, Jacques Giedd for stimulating my interest in design policy, and Victor Mangolin for editorial assistance.

Introduction

The unfortunate social and economic conditions of Third World<sup>1</sup> societies have instigated designers and design scholars to pay attention to the needs of this two-thirds of the world population. The "ideology" of design as problem solving drives designers and design scholars to think about how design can contribute to helping Third World societies. The 1970s witnessed the emergence of this awareness. Victor Papanek, in his classic Design for the Real World, called for designers' attention to the predicament of these societies. As an industrial designer, Papanek believed that "design has become the most powerful tool with which man [and woman] shapes his [and her] tools and environments (and, by extension, society and himself)." Furthermore, Papanek asserted that "design must become an innovative, highly creative, cross-disciplinary tool responsive to the true needs of men [and women]."<sup>2</sup> Papanek's notion of design for the Third World was quite novel at a time when most designers in industrial, developed countries were concentrating on serving profit-oriented industrial corporations, celebrating high mass consumption society.

Following Papanek's challenge, the International Council of Societies of Industrial Design (ICSID) organized the "Design for Need" conference in April 1976. Held at the Royal College of Art, the conference represented the international design community's general awareness of design's responsibility in contemporary society, examining the social contribution of design at both the philosophical and practical levels. Gui Bonsiepe, a Brazilian design thinker, provocatively brought up the issue of design in Third World countries in a broader sense. Bonsiepe's point of view, however, was quite different from that of Papanek. While Papanek proposed the idea of design for the Third World from the materiality of design, Bonsiepe construed the issue of Third World design from the political and economic relations between the First and the Third World, or in Bonsiepe's terms using a Marxist-oriented dependency framework, central and peripheral countries. Bonsiepe scrutinized the inequalities in the distribution of wealth caused by a system of unequal exchange or "value transfer" from peripheral to central economies. He proposed a model of design transfer that would rely on an industrialization policy "that promotes a self-centered or autonomous economy, as 1 I prefer using the term Third World, which represents a group of countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America whose social history is characterized by the postcolonial culture. Although the Second World of communist countries has collapsed, the concept of the First and the Third World still is widely used to refer to two groups of countries separated by a considerable gap in economic and political power in global affairs. See Arturo Escobar, Encountering Developing: The Making and Unmaking of the Third World (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995).
