

3. OVERVIEW OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

According to Cloete (1988:46), public administration gradually developed from political science into a discipline in its own right. Public administrations needs a philosophical foundation and unique theories on which to base public administration practices, hence the philosophical foundation of public administration is political philosophy, a subject that developed from political science. The field of study of public administration is government institutions and the activities that are undertaken to achieve the objectives. Political Science on the other hand is the study of political behaviour and political systems. Both this disciplines focuses on the dynamics of the government systems. The contribution of political scientist such as Woodrow Wilson to public administration, the relationship between the two disciplines becomes very clear, because there are close connections between these two fields of study. Political science can only contribute positively towards a better understanding of public administration.

4. PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Public administration as an activity is as old as the human civilisation, and like the sciences, it could be seen as a process and not a product. It is a vehicle for expressing the values and preferences of citizens, communities, and society as a whole. Public administration has evolved over time with an ever-increasing need for a value-orientated public service approach based on public administrative practices to provide efficient and effective services to meet the changing needs of society. Mumford (1961:10) confirmed that public administration in general could be regarded as an extension of governance. Administrators have been necessary as long as kings and emperors required pages, treasurers, and architects to carry out the business of government. Evidence of basic administrative functions could be traced back to the early inhabitants of ancient Mesopotamia in the development of irrigation systems as a measure to survive. Hammond (1972:174) argued that during the pre-Greek and pre-Western times, government and administration were in a simplistic way situated with the monarch, who had no intention to devolve power. The administrative process probably settled during the classical times of the Greeks in 510–338 B.C. when the democratic city-state came into existence which was characterized by the devolution of sovereignty.
