Payne, Randy R. Gainey, 2005 This book fills a void in the literature by examining from a scientific perspective the official police response to drugs drug use abuse and dealing and how the different levels of police agencies process drug cases Current drug texts simply do not address the drug problem from a criminal justice or criminological perspective in a clear consistent fashion At the beginning of each chapter a series of critical thinking questions is provided Throughout each chapter a series of tables figures and charts are used to illustrate themes considered With these items critical thinking questions are included below each respective item The text also makes use of Internet technology inasmuch as students are referred to recommended Internet sites throughout each chapter Many of these Internet sites deal with pharmacological and biological aspects of drug use Three unique pedagogical features of the book will help students learn various drug related issues First a box insert titled In the Streets appears in each chapter that includes a discussion about some aspects of drug use related to the chapter s focus A second box titled Tabloid Justice also appears in each chapter discussing a particular celebrity s battles with drug abuse as it was considered in the press A third box Drugs and Research in each chapter highlights a specific drug study that should be of interest to students This book will appeal to a number of criminal justice criminology and sociology program courses on drug abuse Professionals interested in learning more about the criminal justice response to the drug problem as well as police academies may also find the book useful
