

RHETORIC, PHILOSOPHY, AND OBJECTIVISM: AN ATTENUATION OF THE CLAIMS OF THE RHETORIC OF INQUIRY

James W. Hikins and Kenneth S. Zagacki

It is wrong to imagine that social forms merely distort our consciousness of reality and cut us off from knowledge of the objective nature of things. . . . Still less do they "construct" their own merely mental and subjective world. . . . Quite the contrary, it is only by social means—and especially through the use of the language—that we can gain a knowledge of objective reality, beyond the most basic and elementary level.

—Sean Sayers¹

RHETORICAL THEORY has long evidenced interest in articulating the relationship between philosophy and rhetoric. Although thinkers from at least the time of Plato have considered this relationship, recent approaches urge that rhetoric be "resituated" at what has been proclaimed "the end of philosophy."² Some theorists, such as Calvin Schrag, presume that philosophy has been suitably "deconstructed"—philosophical problems literally "dissolved"—from within philosophical circles.³ Moreover, as John Nelson and Alan Megill put it, a conceptually adequate and pragmatically useful replacement for foundationalism and objectivism is rhetoric or, more precisely, a "rhetoric of inquiry."⁴

This essay challenges claims that philosophy, conceived by Richard Rorty as "systematic" or by Schrag as "a special body of knowledge, a formalized epistemological discipline programmed to represent reality," is either dead or infirm.⁵ In critiquing current conceptions of philosophy as rhetoric we support both a version of foundationalist epistemology and an objectivist ontology. We seek to examine critically the current trend of elevating the status of rhetoric at the expense of diluting the epistemological significance of philosophy.

Central to our argument is the contention that the rhetoric of inquiry is grounded on erroneous and inconsistent assumptions.⁶ We believe these assumptions entail consequences defeating the very advantages claimed by rhetoric of inquiry theorists, and that present formulations of the rhetoric of inquiry prevent an adequate account of past progress in the sciences, philosophy, and the arts. We examine the presumption that only by abandoning traditional conceptions of epistemology can a meaningful role be assigned to rhetoric in the generation of knowledge, taking issue with the notion that competing views relegate to rhetoric an inferior role.

To be clear, our objective in this paper is not to reject wholesale the claims of the rhetoric of inquiry, many of which enlighten our understanding of communication, especially at the level of praxis. We seek instead to challenge the basic presuppositions of the rhetoric of inquiry, in the spirit recently suggested by Herbert W. Simons.⁷ The alternative we develop, based on a view termed "rhetorical realism," accounts for progress in the arts and sciences, and secures as well a disqualifying role for rhetoric with powers at least equivalent to those of the rhetoric of inquiry.⁸

At the same time, adopting realism as a foundation for a theory of rhetoric will not,
