

21. The Algebra of Propositions

In this section we formalize the propositional calculus. The propositional calculus is an extension of a propositional calculus used in the last section, one concerned with truth-functional logical connectives. The propositional calculus, which we introduce by giving the logic a truth-functional interpretation, is formalized in the next section.

21.1. Propositional Calculus

This section formalizes the propositional calculus using truth-functional connectives. Regarding the motivation, that is, the motivation for the logic, we refer to the last section. In addition we note that there have been proposed the terms "logic formally" and "logical calculus" (in a different sense) for describing propositional logic. The expression "logical calculus" is "logical" here being understood as the theory of a propositional calculus (in a broad sense) and "calculus" being understood as

1.  $\mathcal{L}$  for a propositional calculus.

2.  $\mathcal{L}$  for a logic (see [1], p. 10).

3.  $\mathcal{L}$  for a logic (in the sense of the propositional calculus) (see [2], p. 10).

In addition, it should be noted that the propositional calculus is the propositional part of the theory of a logic (in [1], p. 10). That is, in a broad sense, a logic is a theory of a propositional calculus. In addition, it should be noted that the propositional calculus is a part of a logic (in the sense of the propositional calculus) (see [2], p. 10).
