The Development of Neuropsychology

PORTRAIT

Living with Traumatic Brain Injury

L.D., an aspiring golfer, had worked as a cook. Following brain damage, the lawyers negotiating his case puzzled over how L.D. continued to excel at golf but at the same time was unable to return to his former work as a cook.

Four years earlier, when he was 21, L.D. had been invited to participate in a sports promotion at a pub. He became ill and was helped onto a balcony by a pub employee. On the balcony, he slipped out of the employee's grasp and fell down five flights of stairs, striking his head against the stairs and wall. He was taken, unconscious, to the emergency ward of the local hospital, where his concussion was assessed on the Glasgow Coma Scale rating as 3, the lowest score on a scale from 3 to 15.

A computed tomography (CT) scan revealed bleeding and swelling on the right side of L.D.'s brain. A neurosurgeon performed a craniotomy (skull removal) over his right frontal cortex to relieve pressure and remove blood. A subsequent CT scan revealed further bleeding on the left side of his brain, and a second craniotomy was performed.

When discharged from the hospital 6 weeks later, L.D.'s recall of the events consisted only of remembering that he had entered the pub and then becoming aware that he was in a hospital 3 weeks later. L.D. was unable to return to work because he found the multitasking involved in preparing meals too difficult. He was seeking compensation from the company that had hosted the sports promotion and from the pub where he had been injured.

We found that L.D. became frustrated and annoyed when attempting to cook. He had lost his sense of smell and taste and was not interested in socializing. He and his girlfriend had ended their 4-year relationship. We administered a comprehensive neuropsychological examination, and his scores on most tests were typical, except for tests of verbal memory and attention. Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), a brain-scanning method that can reveal the brain's structure in detail, showed some diffuse damage to both sides of his brain. The accompanying positron emission tomography (PET) images contrast blood flow in a healthy brain (top) to blood flow in patients like L.D. (bottom).

Based on previous patients with traumatic brain injuries and behavioral and brain symptoms similar to L.D.'s, we recommended compensation, which L.D. did receive, in addition to assistance in finding work less demanding than cooking. He was able to live on his own and successfully returned to playing golf.

According to National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke estimates, 1.7 million U.S. residents receive medical attention each year after suffering traumatic brain injury (TBI), a wound to the brain that results from a blow to the head (detailed in Section 26.3, including concussion, the common term for mild TBI). TBI is a contributing factor in 30% of deaths due to accidents and can result from head blows while playing sports, from falls, and from vehicle accidents. While also the most common cause of discharge from military service
