

11. I was taken sick on the street with a spell. When I woke up you were there to give me some medicine, and you told me to take it.

12. Somebody was sticking me with hot irons, and I tried to run away from him and could not.

13. I was riding in an elevator in a big building. It went up so fast, it went right through the roof. I was on a large boat with a lot of people, and all were on one side of the boat. It capsized and we were all drowned.

14. I went up to see my aunt who has been dead for six years. It took me two days to get there, and when I got there she was sick. She told me to get out. (Patient's association in this dream was that he was very fond of this aunt and that he used to go to visit her often.)

15. I was fighting with a lot of dead people, sticking knives at them, shooting them with a gun, but they didn't do anything. They got scared.

16. I was fighting fish at the bottom of the sea. They got frightened.

We note that the most common content of the dream is the threat of annihilation. The next type of dream in frequency is the aggression dream, in which the patient himself is the aggressor but is usually defeated.

These dreams are capable of several typical transformations. The first of these may be called "the Sisyphus dream" or the frustration dream. In this type the individual is usually confronted with a persistent and unshakable frustration. Whatever activity he engages upon is greeted with a certain stereotyped futility. Thus, the same patient whose dreams were recorded above dreams also the following:

"I was in the room, and everything I touched or grabbed was turned into sand. I put my hands in my pockets, and there was sand in them. I took off my coat, and there was sand in it. Everyplace I looked I saw sand; every place I walked, I was in sand. I tried to get away, but the harder I tried, the deeper I would sink into it."

Some time later the patient brought another dream of the same variety, but instead of sand everything turned into water, and he awoke as he was almost drowned. Though the patient could not help me with associations, the symbol of sand and water is typical for situations in which fatigue sets in very easily.

From this type of dream to the next one is an obvious transition. This second type of transformation may be called "the occupational dream," which has hitherto been described by MacCurdy and others
