Abstract. Neutron spectroscopy is an important method for the study of microscopic dynamics because it captures the spatial as well as the temporal aspects of the atomic or molecular motion. In this article techniques will be presented which are of special importance for the study of confined systems. Many of these are based on the fact that neutron scattering is isotope-dependent. Possible sources of systematic errors in measurements of confined systems will be pointed out.

1 Introduction

Neutron spectroscopy has established itself as one of the leading methods in the study of dynamics in confined systems. In this article a short introduction into the methods, techniques, and limitations will be presented. Section 2 will recapitulate basic facts about neutron spectroscopy focusing on the meaning of the experimental result as spatiotemporal correlation function and its formulation for multicomponent systems. In section 3 experimental setups for different dynamic ranges will be shown. The special techniques available for confined systems are introduced in section 4 and limitations will be mentioned.

References [1–6] to this paper are textbooks covering the content of sections 2 and 3 in more detail. The further references are intended for the reader interested in particular details.

2 Basic principles of inelastic neutron scattering

The basic quantity measured in inelastic neutron scattering<sup>1</sup> (IENS) is the probability of a neutron being scattered by a sample with a certain momentum transfer  $\mathbf{Q} = \mathbf{k}' - \mathbf{k}$  and energy transfer  $\hbar\omega = E' - E$ .  $\mathbf{k}$  is the incident wave vector of the neutron, related by  $k = 2\pi/\lambda$  to the wavelength.  $E = \hbar^2/2m_n\lambda^2$  is the incident energy.  $\mathbf{k}'$  and  $E'$  are <sup>1</sup> In this paper “neutron spectroscopy” is understood as analysis of neutron scattering with respect to its frequency components. This implies inelastic neutron scattering but excludes neutron diffraction which ignores the energy dependence of the scattering. Furthermore, “inelastic” will be understood as “not elastic in any way” and therefore including the case of ‘quasi-elastic’ scattering QENS (i.e. centred closely to  $\hbar\omega = 0$ ).
