

NEUTRALIZATION OF SOUTHEAST ASIA : PROBLEMS AND PERSPECTIVES

by V. SURYANARAYAN

SOUTHEAST Asia has been the theatre of fratricidal strife and internecine warfare during the last thirty years. The tragedy in Vietnam, the civil war in Laos, the continuing political upheaval in Cambodia, the secessionist movements in Burma and the Philippines—all these illustrate not only the interplay of domestic and external forces, but also the deep involvement of outside Powers in the region.

Various suggestions have been put forward in recent years to solve the endemic problems of Southeast Asia. Currently, the attention of Southeast Asian governments is focussed on Malaysia's proposal of neutralization of Southeast Asia. The proposal is intended to insulate the region from Great Power rivalry and create a framework under which the countries of the region can peacefully pursue their tasks of social and economic development.

The idea of neutralization is not entirely new to Southeast Asia. The main thrust of Indian diplomacy during the Geneva Conference (April-July 1954) was to extend the "area of peace" to Indo-China. The Geneva Agreements were intended to promote the independence and to safeguard the territorial integrity of Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam by ensuring their freedom from external interference, through neutralization guaranteed by all Great Powers. As Jawaharlal Nehru explained to the Indian Parliament:

Suppose countries like Laos and Cambodia were overwhelmed and drawn into the sphere of China, the countries on the other side would naturally be frightened. On the other hand, if Laos and Cambodia became hostile to China and could be used as bases for attack on China, naturally China would object to it very strongly...So at Geneva, they wisely decided, more or less, though not in clear language, that the Indo-China States should keep out of military pacts or alliances on either side, or in other words, remain neutralized.¹

Unfortunately for Indo-China, the main provisions of the Geneva Agreements were never implemented. The American opposition to non-alignment, coupled with South Vietnam's open repudiation of the Geneva Agreements, vitiated the Indo-Chinese atmosphere and led to renewed hostilities.

In July 1962, the Geneva Conference on Laos again veered round to the view that neutrality was the only guarantee for the security and survival of Laos. The Conference issued a "Declaration on Laotian Neutrality." Under the Declaration, Laos undertook not to enter into any "military alliance" or allow the establishment of "any foreign military base" on Laotian territory, and not to allow any country to use its territory "for military purposes or for the purposes
