
Mainstreaming Gender: An Examination of Feminist Methodology in Social Work Research

Katie R. Lauve-Moon, Shelby Ensmann, and Vanessa Hentz

Despite gender being central to any given social issue and the profession of social work's commitment to social justice, gender and gender inequality remain tangential to mainstream social work goals as partially indicated by the Grand Challenges for Social Work initiative led by the American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare. Feminist methodologists prioritize the investigation of gender inequality by elevating the voices of oppressed groups, particularly women, using qualitative and mixed-methods studies, focusing on structural social change, and emphasizing the need for intersectional inquiry. Feminist and other critical methodologies frame structural inequality as central to the examination of all social issues and research questions. This study investigates the extent to which gender and gender inequality are investigated in mainstream social work research. Specifically, drawing on 404 research articles from three mainstream social work journals, this research relies on content analysis to demonstrate the dearth of studies examining gender and gender inequality in mainstream social work research. This work also presents opportunities for social workers to position gender as central to understanding persisting structural inequalities of the 21st century and work toward a more equitable social order.

KEY WORDS: critical methodology; critical research; feminist methodology; gender inequality; social work research

Gender functions as one of the greatest inequitable divisions in society and transcends all fields of social work practice, education, and research. Moreover, the issue of gender inequality undergirds almost every identified social issue including homelessness, addiction, violence, work and labor, poverty, self-esteem, leadership, mental and physical health, child development, and so on. In fact, patterns of gender inequality prove salient even in our own social justice-oriented profession with men disproportionately occupying positions of power (Williams, 2013). Despite these trends, gender and gender inequality remain tangential to mainstream social work goals as partially indicated by the Grand Challenges for Social Work (GCSW) initiative led by the American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare (AASWSW).

Some social workers have argued for the utilization of feminist methodologies as a critical approach to research aimed at investigating different components of a dominant gender structure that reinforce inequality between men and women at various levels of society (Sprague, 2016; Swigonski, 1993).

This article investigates the extent to which feminist methodologies are used in mainstream social work research and argues for the centralization of issues of gender within the overall social work research agenda. Drawing on 404 research articles from three mainstream social work research journals, this article investigates the extent to which mainstream social work research pursues questions of gender inequality and integrates core elements of feminist methodology into research design.

FEMINIST METHODOLOGY

Critical methodology calls into question dominant ideals of traditional social science research and seeks to reveal unjust processes that are otherwise assumed to be natural, necessary, or normal (Thomas, 1993). In particular, feminist methodology offers approaches for critical researchers to investigate gender inequality at various levels of society including the individual, interactional, organizational, and institutional.
