

Numerical Solution of Differential Equations Using Spreadsheets

Spreadsheets provide approximate methods for solving differential equations numerically. These methods are analogous to the numerical methods of finding definite integrals, but they can be applied to a much broader range of problems including those which lead to second- and higher-order equations and those which lead to equations in several variables which have to be solved simultaneously.

The solution of such problems is not required by most senior maths syllabuses, yet the mathematics required is less sophisticated than that required for many traditional senior calculus problems which require analytical solutions. Examining such problems in the senior mathematics class has a number of benefits:

- It neatly expands the range of problems which students can model;
- It brings many more meaningful problems within the reach of students;
- It gives experience in meaningful use of technology;
- It introduces students to a technique which is of great importance in applied mathematics;
- It enables students to simulate and experiment with mathematical models of complex situations and to examine the effects of changes in parameters and initial conditions without the need to be able to solve the problems analytically or of laborious re-calculations;
- Use of the spreadsheet facilitates easy graphical presentation of the results, both during experimentation and at completion of the problem.

The remainder of this article consists of notes on the application of spreadsheet techniques to five problems. Problem 1 is a fairly trivial problem which can be solved very simply by analytical means. It is included to demonstrate the technique. The other four problems are of the type to which one might realistically apply such techniques.

The accompanying spreadsheets contain working sheets for each problem. Parameters for each can be adjusted to see the different possible results.
