

DISCOVERY OF DNA

Chapter 1: The Beginning – Friedrich Miescher (1869)

Friedrich Miescher was a young Swiss physician working in the laboratory of Felix Hoppe-Seyler, a prominent biochemist in Tübingen, Germany. Miescher was interested in studying the composition of cells, particularly white blood cells, which he extracted from pus on surgical bandages. Using salt solutions, he managed to isolate the nuclei from these cells.

Miescher then used a weak alkaline solution to dissolve the nuclei and found that they contained a substance unlike anything previously identified. This substance was neither a protein nor a lipid, the two major types of biological molecules known at that time. It was rich in phosphorus and had acidic properties. Miescher called it "nuclein" because it was found in the nucleus. Today, we know this substance as DNA. Miescher's discovery was revolutionary, but it did not gain much attention. During the 19th century, proteins were considered the primary candidates for carrying genetic information due to their complexity and diversity. Thus, nuclein's significance remained unrecognized for several decades.
