

This is a book to dip into, not a book for the individual to buy. Medical libraries will perhaps wish to add it to a well-established collection on psychiatry, but it could not stand as the only representative of books on therapeutics in the speciality. It has many useful things to say about the broad principles of treatment, but, inevitably, it cannot provide the detailed account of each procedure that would make it a true therapist's handbook.

M. G. GELDER

Medical Care for Mountain Climbers

Peter Steele. (Pp 220; £3.50.) William Heinemann, 1976.

The author is well equipped to write this book, having taken part in many expeditions, some at high altitude. He writes to advise not medically qualified personnel but mountaineers themselves, and the book is intended as a first-aid manual to be carried by parties during expeditions. It covers in simple language a wide variety of illnesses and mountain accidents and has useful sections on frostbite, high altitude pulmonary and cerebral oedema, and on drugs and medical equipment.

Criticism, inherent in any review of a technical book directed at the public, lies in the difficult area of what one should expect of untrained people, often far from help whom they are faced with a serious medical problem. The author's attitude is to give advice about important procedures such as the treatment of tension pneumothorax, suprapubic drainage of the bladder, and incising burns, and provided the reader is careful and not an enthusiast this information should be very valuable. However, I think many climbers will have seen so few accidents or serious illnesses that they will find it difficult to make the diagnosis required before embarking on such measures.

In general this book is a useful addition to the growing subject of mountain medicine and will I feel sure be popular with the mountaineering world.

Recent Advances in Plastic Surgery

Ed James Calnan. (Pp 210; £9.50.) Churchill Livingstone, 1976.

The 30 interesting and informative chapters of this book are written largely by British authors. Assessment and surgery of the chondrosarcoma hand is presented in two good chapters, which, however, occupy valuable space with detailed personal results. Nasal injury is nicely appraised by an author who by his references seems to be alone in this field. An update of the management of automobile injuries of the face revises old concepts and priorities and is concisely presented. Advances in the application of flap surgery, considerable in the past five years, are well described, and they are related to the more radical and aesthetic surgery for cancer of the head and neck that these flaps permit. Brief chapters on submucous cleft palate and on plastic surgery services in Belfast contribute some advance.

The purchaser may expect the title of a book to describe its contents. But reviews of surgery for speech, diagnosis and management of the swollen leg, conservative management of leg ulcers by elevation, admissions to a burns unit, and fast neutron therapy either contained no advance or could not be said to be plastic surgery. The book is inular in its authorship, and some good chapters are spoilt by padding and telescopic views of the authors' work.

Considerable advances have been made in the past five years in the microsurgery of vessels and nerves. Craniofacial surgery has seen the opening up of exciting possibilities. Free muscle grafting has achieved wide application and acceptance. Nasendoscopy is helping us to assess our cleft-palate results and to teach us which operation to do. Patients with extensive burns, treated by various procedures are enabled to survive and return to a satisfactory way of life. None of these subjects found space in this book, and thus within the terms of the title I found it disappointing. Nonetheless, it is informative and enjoyable reading.

Clinical Hypnosis

Eds Harold B Crossbeck and James A Hall. (Pp 345; £10.15.) Giroux and Stratton, 1976.

Medical enthusiasm for hypnosis has waxed and waned in a cyclical fashion ever since Mesmer's day, when it was tossed to and fro from one or other commission of the French Academy. Although interest in the subject spread gradually and unevenly to other countries, it was in France that the study of the clinical aspects of hypnosis began, and, after a time, ended with Charcot. Thereafter in that country it fell almost totally into disrepute, nothing of substance being written on the subject until 1966, when Chereuk's monograph was published. The authors of this present book believe that loss of interest in hypnosis was largely due to Freud's rejection. However, those who have read Axel Munthe's Story of San Michele, with its vivid description of just what went on in Charcot's clinic, might well prefer to believe that hypnosis was abandoned in France because of a growing distaste for the covertings of Charcot's hysterics, together with his and his colleagues' descriptions, as objective, of those phenomena which they themselves apparently produced unknowingly by suggestion, even using magnets as aids.

While in the United Kingdom and possibly elsewhere hypnosis was less neglected, as a therapeutic tool it seems to have gained little ground. But the authors believe that the general attitude to the subject may now have changed, feeling that after "almost two centuries of episodic popularity and abandonment the use of hypnosis as a standard tool in psychotherapeutic, medical, and dental treatment is now assured." One wonders.

In their theoretical considerations they exhibit a bias away from a purely psychological view of the nature of hypnosis (suggestibility, etc) towards a more physiological kind of explanation with a stated preference for a "psychostructural" hypothesis, the nature of which is not fully specified but which perhaps is intended to ensure the scientific respectability of the subject. Thus it is stated that a circumoral pallor of the lip margins "frequently appears in good hypnotic subjects from many different cultures," though precisely why appears to be unknown.

Most of the book is concerned with more practical issues and the use of hypnosis in a wide variety of conditions, some of somatic, others of psychic, origin and some a mixture of the two. It may interest those who have struggled with both problems to learn, for example, that smokers successfully treated by hypnosis—about two-thirds according to the authors' own findings—gain less weight than longstanding compulsive smokers who discontinue the habit without the aid of hypnosis.

It is difficult to be non-partisan about a book of this kind. Without wishing in any way to doubt the authors' conclusions on the benefits to be obtained from hypnosis in such a remarkably wide variety of conditions a medical teacher might be left wondering why a major portion of curricular time is not now devoted to the subject. Perhaps the day has at last arrived for a detailed objective inquiry, not on this occasion by the French Academy but perhaps by some such body as the Medical Research Council. Although everyday experience suggests that a state of cynical disbelief may still generally prevail, surely the truth of the matter is not totally undiscoverable?

Wilms' Tumour

Ed Carl Pochedly and Denis Miller. (Pp 239; £13.40.) Wiley Biomedical, 1976.

This beautifully produced monograph gives a comprehensive picture of Wilms' tumour. A multidisciplinary group of oncologists write in detail on all aspects of nephroblastoma. In the first part of the book the biological and biochemical behaviour is discussed, and in the second part the best management of this tumour is considered.

Full accounts of experimental work on the genetics, biochemistry, immunology, and pathology are given, and case histories illustrate various aspects of the disease. It appears that this work has helped considerably in the understanding of nephroblastoma but does not alter the clinical management to any great extent. The second part of the book discusses diagnosis and management in detail and the importance of the team approach is emphasized. Each aspect—diagnosis, surgery, radiotherapy, and chemotherapy—is considered separately, but their interdependence is clearly stated, and the final chapter on prognostic pointers underlines this.

All chapters are headlined, and a summary of the contents is given at the end of each with a full list of references. Comprehensive author and subject indices make the book easy to use. Photographs and diagrams abound and complement the text. Unfortunately many printing errors mar this otherwise well-produced book. In one case an important paragraph on chemotherapy is left incomplete and is hence incomprehensible, and one or two other passages are far from clear. However, apart from these faults it is an extremely useful book and should prove of interest to postgraduate students interested in paediatric oncology. As well as giving a clear account of Wilms' tumour it indicates how it can be used as a model for the study and management of other solid tumours in childhood.
