

A typical game theory project would consider 20 – 25 different options. The output of the process is a set of outcomes one is called the “Natural Outcome”, resulting from all players following their natural self interest. Another is the “Best Attainable Outcome” (for the client), resulting from the client also taking subtle and possibly counter intuitive actions.

Probabilistic decision Analysis:

Probabilistic decision analysis processes have high value in cases where the value of different outcomes is highly dependent on quantifiable external uncertainties that are not determined by actions taken by identifiable players. Examples of such uncertainties could be the weather, the foreign exchange rate, and the future price of oil. Uncertain future events are represented as decision trees or probability distributions.

Decision Analysis can be well explained like the game theory block diagram.

The input of a decision analysis process is the structure of an issue (influence diagram or decision tree), with identified external uncertainties and decision variables. Typically, a decision analysis would handle two to four actions (or decisions). The outcome of a formal decision analysis is a recommended or preferred set of decisions for the client.

Similarities:

Although the analysis processes and tools are quite different, success of a project using either methodology is quite dependent on participation by the right individuals from the client company
