Probability and Statistics Didier Dacunha-Castelle,Marie Duflo,2012-12-06 How can we predict the future without asking an astrologer When a phenomenon is not evolving experiments can be repeated and observations therefore accumulated this is what we have done in Volume I However history does not repeat itself Prediction of the future can only be based on the evolution observed in the past Yet certain phenomena are stable enough so that observation in a sufficient interval of time gives usable information on the future or the mechanism of evolution Technically the keys to asymptotic statistics are the following laws of large numbers central limit theorems and likelihood calculations We have sought the shortest route to these theorems by neglecting to present the most general models The future statistician will use the foundations of the statistics of processes and should satisfy himself about the unity of the methods employed At the same time we have adhered as closely as possible to present day ideas of the theory of processes For those who wish to follow the study of probabilities to postgraduate level it is not a waste of time to begin with the least difficult technical situations This book for final year mathematics courses is not the end of the matter It acts as a springboard either for dealing concretely with the problems of the statistics of processes or viii In trod uction to study in depth the more subtle aspects of probabilities Probability and Statistics Didier Dacunha-Castelle,Marie Duflo,2012-08-14 Who is a probabilist Someone who knows the odds of drawing an ace of diamonds or the waiting time at a ticket office A mathematician who uses a special vocabulary And who is a statistician Someone who is capable of determining whether tobacco encourages cancer or the number of votes which a certain candidate will poll at the next elections Each one perceives the link chance The probabilist guided by his intuition of poker or queues constructs an abstract model having fixed the mathematical framework he calmly follows through his logical reasoning which sometimes him very far from his starting point The statistician takes works on solid ground When a doctor asks him if it is worth using a new drug he uses the tools of a probabilist However he must reach a decision the least harmful option based on analyzing the doctor s observations while taking into account the various risks involved In short a probabilist keeps his hands clean while dreaming of models while a statistician must dirty his hands while working with concrete facts Relations between the two have often been difficult but the barriers to their dialogue are broken down by the interest in the concrete to supplement theoretical dreams or in complicated models to describe various phenomena However few students have a chance to overcome these barriers Mathematical Reviews ,2003 Mathematical Methods in Survival Analysis, Reliability and Quality of Life Catherine Huber,Nikolaos Limnios,Mounir Mesbah,Mikhail S.
