Introduction

The border between philosophy and theology is like that between England and Scotland: on the ground it can be hard to locate but the unique character of each territory is sometimes fiercely upheld by their inhabitants. To make it all the more difficult to identify, there are those sub-disciplines of 'philosophical theology' and 'philosophy of religion' that seem to set out deliberately to thwart those who would like there to be a neat boundary. At present there is no clear or accepted distinction between philosophical theology and philosophy of religion, and the two books under review do not explicitly raise the topic, but their methodological differences suggest that a distinction needs to be made.

Plantinga and Marshall deal with central questions concerning the epistemology of Christian belief. They are thus engaged with philosophical issues, but, as we shall see, they each have very different approaches and these generate very different outcomes concerning the integrity of Christian faith and thought in their relationship with philosophy. Their books are characteristic of the intellectual currents of our times: Marshall's of the resurgence of an avowedly 'confessional' approach to theology which questions much of the mediating paradigm that has been dominant; Plantinga's of the flourishing of the confident, avowedly Christian approach to philosophy that he himself has done so much to found and sustain and
