Reservoirs and earthquakes

Meade, R B

Engng Geol V30, N3/4, June 1991, P245-262

In 1982 the US Army Corps of Engineers published a report on reservoir induced seismicity for cases documented prior to 1980. It was based on water level data and earthquake catalogue data for 8 major dams. Following a brief review of this work, the method is applied to data from Koyna (India) and Aswan (Egypt). Analysis does not support classification of the 1981 Koyna earthquakes as reservoir induced, and backs previous suggestions that the earthquake and reservoir activities at Aswan are not closely connected.

Dynamic soil reaction to axially loaded piles

Kagawa, T

J Geotech Engng Div ASCE V117, N7, July 1991, P1001-1020

Dynamic soil-reaction characteristics of axially loaded single piles have been studied to find simple and rational numerical models for beam-on-Winkler foundation type analyses. The proposed dynamic t-z and Q-z models give reliable responses for a variety of conditions. They can be easily incorporated in frequency and time domain analyses, and thus can be extended to problems with nonlinear interaction effects, although they are based on purely linear elastic soil-pile conditions. These models can be used to improve reliability of existing static t-z and Q-z relations at small pile settlements, and to predict axial response of dynamically loaded pile foundations.

Horizontal impedance of embedded strip foundations in layered soil

Ahmad, S; Bhargadwaj, A

J Geotech Engng Div ASCE V117, N7, July 1991, P1021-1041

A boundary element method incorporating isoparametric boundary elements is used to examine influence of key mechanical and geometric parameters on dynamic horizontal stiffness of a rigid strip foundation embedded in a layered soil. Effects of embedment depth, thickness of the top soil layer, contact height of foundation wall and backfill, and relative shear wave velocities for a two layered soil profile are investigated. Results are presented in simple dimensionless graph form.

Longitudinal impacts on piles

Kolymbas, D

Soil Dynam Earthq Engng V10, N5, July 1991, P264-270

Transmission and reflection of longitudinal waves resulting from the impact of a falling weight on an elastic rod which is ideal-plastically embedded in the surrounding medium is analysed. From this work a simplified formula is developed to predict the bearing capacity of piles from dynamic testing. A simple correction for radiation damping is proposed to account for material viscosity.

Probabilistic analysis of seismically induced permanent movements in earth dams

Pal, S K; Rahman, M S; Tseng, C C

Soils Found V31, N1, March 1991, P47-59

Analysis of seismic response of earth dams involves an uncertainty inherent in the specification of ground motion. This is here handled by modelling movement as a portion of a stationary random process. The dam is modelled as a series of shear slices. Nonlinearity of shear modulus and damping is incorporated by using an equivalent linear model for the constitutive behaviour of soil. Seismic response to vertically propagating S waves is formulated in the frequency domain. Permanent displacements result from accumulation of slips of a block detached from the main body of the dam.

Seismic loading of foundations in a centrifuge

Mortier, P; Bourdin, B

Proc International Symposium on Computer and Physical Modelling in Geotechnical Engineering, Bangkok, 2-6 December 1986 P343-350. Publ Rotterdam: A A Balkema, 1989

Centrifugal testing systems are widely employed in modelling geotechnical structures. A CESTA centrifuge has been used to simulate the behaviour of large specimens under static and dynamic conditions. The main test aims were to define soil-structure interaction and simulate seismic activities transmitted in the soil. The centrifuge system is illustrated and the ability to simulate accelerograms for past earthquakes is demonstrated.

Tip reaction in vertical vibration of floating piles - a new approach

Bose, S K; Haldar, S S

Soil Dynamics and Liquefaction, Proc 4th International Conference on Soil Dynamics and Earthquake Engineering, Mexico City, 23-26 October 1989 P227-232. Publ Southampton: Computational Mechanics Publications, 1989

The tip reaction of a floating pile in a homogeneous isotropic soil under vertical vibration is modelled as the contact problem of an infinitely deeply buried small rigid disc, the lower face of which is in perfect bonding with the soil and the upper face traction free. The mixed boundary value problem is converted into 4 coupled linear Fredholm integral equations and solved numerically. For this model the dynamic stiffness of the soil is about twice that calculated from the contact problem on the elastic half space by the Byscroft model, although the damping factor is much less.

921447

Dynamic response of pile groups

Makris, N; Gazetas, G

Soil Dynamics and Liquefaction, Proc 4th International Conference on Soil Dynamics and Earthquake Engineering, Mexico City, 23-26 October 1989 P263-275. Publ Southampton: Computational Mechanics Publications, 1989

The simplified dynamic analytical method of Dobry and Gazetas to compute the response of pile groups taking pile-soil-pile interaction into account is extended to inhomogeneous deposits. It considers a source pile undergoing vertical harmonic oscillation due to a vertical harmonic load. Shear waves emanating from this pile radiate outward and the wave field affects receiver piles. Comparative and parametric studies validate the model. Results indicate that interaction effects are less important in inhomogeneous soil deposits.
