HCW 1997 ,1997 This is the 6th Heterogeneous Computing Workshop also known as HCW 97 Heterogeneous computing is a very important research area with great practical impact The topic of heterogeneous computing covers many types of systems A heterogeneous system may be a set of machines interconnected by a wide area network and used to support the execution of jobs submitted by a variety of users A heterogeneous system may be a suite of high performance machines tightly interconnected by a fast dedicated local area network and used to process a set of production tasks where the subtasks of each task may execute on different machines in the suite A heterogeneous system may also be a special purpose embedded system such as a set of different types of processors used for automatic target recognition In the extreme a heterogeneous system may consist of a single machine that can reconfigure itself to operate in different ways e g in different modes of parallelism All of these types of heterogeneous systems as well as others are appropriate topics for this workshop series I hope you find the contents of these proceedings informative and interesting and encourage you to look also at the proceedings of past and future HCWs High Performance Computing - HiPC 2000 Mateo Valero,Viktor K.
